

Swanky city chic describes the night Lauren and Andrew said "I do": 1) Lincoln Hall at The Union League of Philadelphia was swash in the warm holiday colors of reds, bronzes and ambers, with centerpieces created by Ardmore's TableArt of "Charles Austin" peachy-pink roses, rust calla lilies, cymbidium orchids and "Brunis"; 2) the newly married couple takes a moment before their reception begins—the bride holds a bouquet trimmed with antique Swiss lace from her grandfather's embroidery company; 3) ornate murals adorn the soaring walls of the Church of the Holy Trinity on Rittenhouse Square where the couple said their vows; 4) the bride is fastened into the fitted lace halter dress she worked to design with Angel Sanchez, whom she met while working on events for Tiffany & Co. in New York prior to moving to Philadelphia; 5) the striking white cake, provided by The Union League, was also detailed with her grandfather's lace.

AFTER LOOKING AT WHAT SEEMED LIKE a million venues, Lauren Anrig and Andrew Addis finally realized the one that made perfect sense: The Union League of Philadelphia. Andrew is from here; Lauren had decided to leave New York and move here; and they both loved the idea of using their wedding as an opportunity to educate their friends and family who aren't from the area on the city they were about to make their home. The Union League is about as historic and traditionally Philadelphia as it gets, and so it all began to fall into place.

After almost four years of friendship at Gettysburg College turned romantic, Lauren and Andrew dated long distance—until her birthday in the fall of 2005, when Andrew surprised her in New York and, after dinner at Per Se, proposed at The Central Park Boathouse. The following August, Lauren moved in with her groom-to-be in Ardmore and (continued on page 161)
